HELPFUL ADVICE TO GOAT

at the top. I have a draining board the same width as the vat, with cleats running diagonally to the center so that the "dip" will run back into the vat, as it drains off of the goat. Two persons are required to work at dipping to an advantage, one at each end of the goat. In using any of the poison dips (which I believe to be the most effective), the utmost care must be taken to prevent any of the fluid from entering the mouth or nostrils.

I always have the water lukewarm, and it does more effective work. As to sheds, almost anything that is warm and dry will suffice; but think it pays to build good sheds. Of course the size of your sheds would be governed by the size of your flock. If I were to build again I think I would arrange to have a driveway through the center of the barn, or perhaps to drive into the center of the barn and have sheds on three sides; have a loft for my hay and trap doors to force down into box racks placed in the center of the sheds. In this way, there is very little waste and the feeding can be done in half the time. Feed any kind of hay but timothy. I make my racks of 1x4 stuff with a 14 inch board at the lower part and posts of 2x4. The space between the lower board and the 14 strip above should be seven inches. There is very little waste in feeding in this rack. Your driveway could be utilized as a kindling pen by cutting it up with "hurdles." I prefer to have the sheds floored and well up off the ground.

Much depends on the arrangement of your pastures. If possible divide them; and then subdivide. Do not keep them too long in one pasture. Keep one pasture fresh for their winter ranges; as that is the trying time for an Angora. Goats like brush; but they are also very partial to grass. If you haven't the grass, sow some forage plant for them. In the valley we sow clover and the dwarf Essex rape. They are very fond of this and get in good condition on it in a very short time. I am wintering 76 head, on five acres of rape, that was sown July 1, but did not come up until along in September. I feed them just a little hay to balance the rations. This feed will last until about May 1, when I will take them off and allow the rape to seed. I think that alfalfa would be good feed for them.

Coyotes, no doubt, will cause you more or less trouble. The department has recommended poisoning and gives explicit directions as to how to drag the bait in radiating lines from a given center and how to prepare a sort of musk to sprinkle over the bait and around in the vicinity of it and tells how you must use new gloves with which to handle the bait and that you must drag a beef hide and wherever you alight from your horse, alight on the beef hide. Now all this sounds very nice and seems very plausible, but the coyote is too cute to be taken in with any such a proposition. They are always on the move and while Mr. M-serv or Mr. Harmon are putting out poison here in the vicinity of Grants Pass, the coyote that has been doing all the mischief is in all probability killing goats for D-n Foeller over on Trail Creek, back of Medford. Mark Twain says that it is not uncommon for a coyote to travel 50 miles before breakfast. I have tried to poison them and to trap them, but without success. I find that the only practical method to exterminate them, is to get good blooded hounds, in each locality and have regular hunt days and everyone turn out and do business with the coyotes. Have an understanding with the people over the neighboring creeks, that in case your dogs should run a coyote over there that they would endeavor to kill it and bring the dogs home and in case their dogs come your way do the same. Coyotes, as you know like deer, have certain "stands," which they pass when the dogs are running them. Place men on these stands, one man in a place, who are "stayers" and "shooters" and places them before you start your dogs. If your dogs are all right, you will be surprised at success in killing your coyotes. Don't take any brass band along and don't have more than one man on each stand and let them keep well secreted. They are even more on the alert and like the proverbial war horse sent sweat the battle afar off, but unlike the horse, to scent the battle afar off is to skiddoo still farther off.

I find that renegade dogs are about as bad enemies of goats as the coyotes. I had to be troubled very much with dogs and hesitated to shoot them, even when I caught them in the very act of chasing and catching the goats. When I would tell the owners about it they would be very indignant over it and say that their dogs never went away from home. I have adopted the plan of keeping two guns at my goat barn—a shot gun and rifle. If dogs simply pass through the place I do not molest them; but if they chase the Angoras I plug them. Of course they don't belong to the parties to whom I have gone to before about it, because their dogs never go away from home.

A very important matter in handling goats is the care of their feet. I do not think, however, that you will be troubled so much here with their feet, as we are, in the Willamette valley. I find that the most effective method to deal with footrot, or sore feet in goats is to pare the foot with a sharp knife until it is like a deer's foot, then dip the foot into a solution of Blue vitrol, white arsenic and warm water. To one gallon of hot water and one pound blue vitrol and two tablespoonful of white arsenic. Keep this dip in a wooden bucket as it will very soon eat through a tin vessel. Foot rot is caused by a microscopic parasite, which gets between the goat's toes and eats into the foot. When once established on a range you will be bothered more or less with it. If you are just getting a bunch of goats I would suggest that you go through them and dip their feet with the above mixture. It may seem like a good deal of work, but will pay you well in the long run. While many cases of losses in Angoras flocks is due to insufficient feed and shelter, lack of dipping, etc., they are not all due to these causes. Did you ever have your goats get weak, commence to scour, get pale around the gills, eyes dull and watery, hair stand out and begin to lag behind the band, get down and die in from three to six days, and all the while they were on good feed? I have; and I lost about 100 goats before I found what was the matter. The cause was intestinal parasites and I lost about 20 more goats before I hit on a remedy. I feed this vermifuge regularly to my goats, putting it in their salt and have not had the least recurrence of the trouble.

I am often asked when is the proper time to breed? That, of course, depends. Have you a small flock and plenty of shed room and some green feed coming on? Then turn in your buck October 1, so the kids will commence coming March 1. If you have a large flock, turn your buck in with the does about November 1, so that the kids will commence coming April 1.

We almost always have good weather in May, but it always seemed to me that a May kid was lacking in vitality. I would prefer to have them come earlier in the season. I have breeding pens 8x8, that will accommodate four does with their babies. I also have hurdles, so that I can cut off a corner of one of these pens for a doe due to kid or one with a very young one. When a doe kids, take hand shears and shear her belly and cut the mohair well out of her flank and see that the little fellow nurses and there is no more trouble to it. I let the suckling does out every day on the green feed unless it storms, keeping the kids in the pens until they are about a month old. If a very young kid is badly chilled which is frequently the case when they come in stormy weather, take a bucket of water just as hot as you can well hold your hand in it and put him in, all but his nose, and keep him stirring around in it. After he begins to revive take him out and dry him with warm cloths and put him in a box near the stove and in an hour he is ready to go back to the doe. Use the best bucks on your flocks you can get; the best are none too good. If your does are coarse and straight haired use a very fine haired buck rather of the fluffy type rather than the ringlets. If your does are of the fluffy type use bucks that are a little on the strong order of fleece and carry ringlets.

Do not be deceived by flowery advertisements which indirectly promise you bucks that will cause your flocks to average 10 pounds of mohair per head or others that hold out the idea that they will send you goats whose fleeces are worth $2 to $6 per pound. You will be handed a gold buck just as a certain purchaser located near me and the man in Arizona, mention of whom was made in the last Oregon Agriculturist. As I have said, use the best rams to be had. You have gold growing on the bushes as well as in the soil; but you must use Angora rams instead of hydraulic rams to secure it. Deal with reliable breeders (there are plenty of them) and have them guarantee the goats to be as represented and if not take them back.
